Header, footer, structure and content, read cold as a prospective buyer

WHY THIS EXISTS

Rob asked Malcolm for a cold, blunt read of the site — no warning, no favours, and no softening. Malcolm gave his own answer and then asked for a second, independent pass so the two could be compared.

This is that second pass. It is deliberately unsoftened, because that is what was asked for. It covers the header and footer, the site structure, the content a sceptical buyer would test, and then works through Rob's eight-step brief in order.

Scope limit, stated up front. This review read the site's structure and content directly. It did not phone the Aria voice line, use the chat widget, or view the site rendered on a phone. Steps 6 and 7 of the brief are therefore answered only as far as the evidence allows, and that is flagged where it happens.

SUMMARY

The body content is good. The furniture around it isn't.

TL;DR: the page bodies have been rebuilt — custom sections, modern layout, well-written copy. The header and footer have not. They are leftovers from the previous WordPress site, and the mismatch is the first thing that reads as wrong.

Underneath that sit three harder problems: the three paid products are not in the navigation at all, there is no social proof anywhere on the site, and the hero contradicts the pricing table on the same page.

The writing is better than most small agency sites. The About page in particular is specific, unpolished and honest in a way that marketing copy almost never is. None of what follows is a criticism of the effort in the copy — it is a criticism of everything wrapped around it.

FINDING ONE

The navigation is the single biggest leak.

The entire menu is:

- Home — with About nested underneath it as a child item
- For Tradies — with four tradie pages underneath

That is all of it. The consequences:

The money pages are not in the menu

AI Voice Agent, AI Automated Office Manager and Automated CRM — the three products with prices attached — cannot be reached from the navigation. The only route in is scrolling the homepage to the pricing block and clicking a card. Every visitor who uses the menu instead of scrolling never finds them.

No Services, no Pricing, no Contact, no Blog

A buyer sizing up a vendor goes to the menu first, and usually straight for pricing. There is nothing there to go to.

"For Tradies" is a dead link

The parent item points at #. On desktop it goes nowhere.

The menu contradicts the positioning

The navigation says tradies. The homepage says trades, health and wellness, legal and financial, real estate, coaches, and medical and dental. A solicitor who reads the menu concludes the site is not for them and leaves before the homepage has had a chance to argue otherwise.

About is buried

It sits as a submenu item under Home. Nobody hunts for About in a dropdown — and on this site About is the strongest page there is. It is being hidden.

There is no phone number in the header

For a business whose central promise is never miss a call, that is the detail a sceptical buyer will enjoy pointing out.

FINDING TWO

The footer dates the site to about 2019.

The footer is a single centred stack: logo, business name, tagline, email, an AI disclosure line, ABN, copyright, a blog link, then five legal links.

It does no navigational work

No phone number, no service links, no contact point beyond an email address, no location past "Australia-Wide". The footer is the second place people look for a way through a site, and it offers nothing. Combined with the menu, the three paid products are orphaned from both ends of every page.

The AI disclosure line should go

"Built with AI-assisted content creation — the same approach we help service businesses automate." The intent is transparency and it is a fair instinct. The effect is that it sits there confirming the exact suspicion a sceptical buyer already arrived with — that the site is AI-generated filler. Nobody gives credit for the admission; they just take it as the answer. Cut it, or move it into a page where the argument can actually be made.

The legal links belong to a different business

Terms, Privacy, Disclaimers, Disclosures and Facebook Policy, all at equal visual weight.

Disclosures and Facebook Policy are affiliate-marketing-era artefacts. They are the clearest single signal of the old theme showing through, and they clash hard with everything above them on the page.

Two smaller things

- The footer logo is served as a 150 × 150 square crop of a 300 × 160 wide logo. It is likely squashed or cut off — worth eyeballing directly.
- The site's declared locale is en_US on an Australian business site. Minor, but it is the kind of detail that gets noticed by the sort of buyer who checks things.

FINDING THREE

What a sceptical buyer would catch in the copy.

In rough order of how much damage each one does.

1. The hero contradicts the pricing table. The homepage stat bar says "$0 — upfront retainer required." The pricing section below it lists one-time setup fees of $797, $1,197 and $1,997. Both claims are on the same page. A buyer who has been burnt before reads that as a bait-and-switch, fairly or not. This is the most damaging item on the list and the easiest to fix.
2. There is no social proof anywhere. No client names, no testimonials, no case studies, no screenshots of results, no before-and-after. The homepage claims a 3–5× average lead flow increase and fourteen days to first automation live, with nothing behind either figure. For the specific buyer Rob described — someone already burnt by a CRM — this is the blocker, and it is the only item on this list that cannot be fixed in an afternoon.
3. "Five services. One growth system." Six services are then listed. Small in itself, but it is the kind of error that makes a careful reader start checking everything else.
4. The receptionist cost figure moves. $2,500/mo in the pricing card, then $2,500–$5,000/month in the comparison box a few lines later. Pick one number and be ready to back it up, because it is the central cost argument on the page.
5. White-Label & Reseller is in the wrong list. It is a partner offer aimed at other agencies, sitting in a service list written for plumbers and physios. It confuses who the page is talking to.

6. Only three of the six services have prices. Ad campaign management, market research and business automation have no pricing at all. The section is headed "Simple pricing. No surprises." — half of it is missing.
7. The founder's name is inconsistent. "Robert Herwynen" in the page metadata, "Rob van Herwynen" on the AI Voice Agent page.
8. There is one call to action and it is a high-commitment one. Every button on the site leads to "book a call". No contact page, no enquiry form, no phone number in the navigation. Someone still in the sizing-up phase has no low-commitment way to make contact, so they leave instead.
9. Emoji are doing the work of an icon set. Throughout the homepage and service pages, section icons are emoji. On a site selling premium automation this reads cheap, and it renders differently on every device. With the old header and footer, it accounts for most of the "doesn't look right" impression.

AGAINST THE BRIEF

Rob's eight steps, answered in order.

Two of these cannot be answered honestly from a structural read. They are marked as such rather than guessed at.

|-------|--------------------------|--|
| 1 | First ten seconds | Clear enough. "We build AI systems that grow your business while you work", with the sub-line naming automation, paid media and lead generation. A reader knows the category. Keep reading — yes. |
| <hr/> | | |
| 2 | Full scroll | The problem section and the four-step system are concrete and believable. What does not survive scrutiny: the 3–5× claim, the fourteen-day claim and the $0 retainer line, all unsupported and one of them contradicted further down the same page. The six-vertical list reads as a business that has not yet decided who it serves. |
| <hr/> | | |
| 3 | Service pages | Plain English throughout, and better than most. The AI Voice Agent page is the strongest of them — specific problem, three-step mechanic, clear inclusions. Two pieces of jargon a non-technical buyer would have to guess at: "Make / n8n" and "overflow handling". |

4	Finding the price	Fast if you scroll the homepage, impossible if you use the menu. Once found it is clear and well presented — setup fee and monthly, itemised, in AUD. The problem is not clarity, it is reachability, and the fact that half the services are missing from it.
5	About page	The best page on the site — see below.
6	Chat widget	Not tested. The widget is present on every page and identifies itself as Aria. Malcolm's own test of it is the evidence here, not this review.
7	Finding the phone number	Answered below, and it is the most useful single item in this document.
8	Would you book?	Not yet — see below.

Step 7 — the phone number is effectively hidden

THE FINDING ROB ASKED FOR

The Aria number, 0480 088 984, appears on exactly one page: the AI Voice Agent page. That page is not in the navigation.

It is not in the header. It is not in the footer. It is not on the homepage. A cold visitor has to scroll the homepage to the pricing block, notice the third card, click through, and arrive there more or less by accident.

Rob asked how hard it was to find. The answer is that most visitors will never find it — and the single best demonstration asset the business owns therefore goes unused. Putting it in the header and the footer is thirty seconds of work and is probably the highest-return change on this entire list.

Step 5 — the About page, and the doubt it raises

It is the best writing on the site, and it is not close. Specific, unpolished, and free of the marketing register that coats everything else. The Jim's Fencing chapter is the only place on the site where Rob sounds like an operator rather than a vendor, and the admission that Magpie Rest is still a plan on a block is the kind of detail that buys credibility precisely because nobody would invent it.

But Rob asked what doubts it raises, so: twelve years of not committing, five years fencing, two years travelling, a house that is still twelve to eighteen months off, and a business that is new. A sceptic reads that arc as this bloke is early, and I would be the guinea pig.

The page builds trust in Rob the person and says nothing about whether he has delivered this for anyone who paid him. It is doing half the job it needs to do. One named client with a result attached would do more than the entire founder story — and the founder story is good.

Step 8 — would I book the call?

No, not yet. One thing is stopping it: there is no evidence that anyone has bought this and had it work.

Everything else in this review is an afternoon's work. That one is not, and it is the one that decides it. Three named clients, what they were losing, what changed, and a number — that is the difference between a site that describes a service and a site that sells one.

IF ONLY THREE THINGS GET DONE

In this order.

- Rebuild the header and footer. Put the three paid products, pricing, About, contact and the phone number in the navigation. Strip Disclosures and Facebook Policy. Remove the AI disclosure line. This fixes the theme mismatch and the biggest structural leak in one pass.
- Resolve the $0 retainer contradiction and standardise the receptionist cost figure. Two small edits that remove the only two places on the site where a buyer catches it being loose with the truth.
- Get three case studies up. Even short ones. Nothing else on this list moves the decision as much, and nothing else takes as long — which is why it should start now rather than after the easy fixes.

Note on this document. This is an independent review produced by an AI assistant at Malcolm's request, based on the site as published on 14 September 2026. It reflects the pages listed on the cover and no others. The chat widget and the Aria voice line were not tested, and no claim is made about either. Judgements about what a prospective buyer would think are reasoned inference, not research — they are worth exactly as much as the argument given for each one, and no more. Nothing here is a substitute for putting the site in front of real prospects and watching what they do.
